I am an accomplished data scientist and project leader with extensive experience in international policy making. I received my PhD in mechanical engineering, statistics and machine learning from the University of Sheffield in 2011. Until 2020 I worked at the European Commission's Joint Research Centre, supporting high-level international policy making with innovative data and policy analysis; and developing composite indicators and scoreboards for monitoring global trends. In parallel, I have built a strong cross-disciplinary academic track record, with a wide range of high-impact publications, and keynote speeches in international conferences.

Since 2020 I have worked as a data science consultant, with clients including the European Commission, UNIDO, UNHCR and the World Intellectual Property Organisation, among others, where I have developed software in the R language. Applications of my work include sustainable development, international connectivity, policy and performance monitoring and impact assessment, environmental science, engineering and economics. I strive to provide deep and innovative data analysis that results in clear and focused messages.
